Autori di questo numero/contributors to this issue

Fabrice Clément is Co-Director of the Cognitive Science Center and Full Professor at the University of Neuchâtel, Switzerland. His research employs a multi-disciplinary approach that bridges social sciences, cognitive sciences, and affective sciences to explore belief formation, trust, and social learning in adults and young children, shedding light on the socio-affective mechanisms that underlie humans' navigation of cultural environments.

Mara Floris is a researcher at Vita-Salute San Raffaele University in Milan. She earned her PhD with a thesis on the relationship between language and categorization in infants at the FINO consortium of the University of Turin. Currently, her research focuses on key areas such as scientific disinformation, communication between patients and healthcare practitioners, and gender studies. Alongside her research, she actively participates in science dissemination projects.

Thomas Ganzetti is a Doctoral researcher at the Social Mind and Body group (SOMBY) of Central European University (CEU), Vienna. His research explores how emotions drive the navigation of our environment, influencing our judgments and decision-making processes, with a specific focus on how adults and young children use emotional displays observed in the absence of direct communication (i.e., Affective observation) to generate predictions about others' expectations and shared values.

Ohan Hominis is a Doctoral researcher at the iSearch lab (Information Search, Ecological and Active learning Research with Children) and at the ACES group (Adaptive Cognition and Economic Behaviour) of Central European University (CEU), Vienna. His research explores how young children and adults actively seek and retrieve information to navigate their environments and solve goal-oriented tasks, with a focus on affective cues as a source of relevant information.

Christian Kliesch is a postdoctoral researcher at the University of Potsdam, Germany. He completed his PhD on the role of infants' understanding of actions in communicative and non-communicative contexts at the University of Lancaster, UK. His research interests are in the emergence of communication and cultural learning in humans from an embodied-enacted perspective.

Lorenzo Leporiere, PhD in History of Science, has worked on psychical research, history of psychiatry and scientific communication. With Francesco Paolo de Ceglia he published La pitonessa, il pirata e l'acuto osservatore. Spiritismo e scienza nell'Italia della belle époque (Editrice Bibliografica, 2018), and Becoming Eusapia. The rise of the "Diva of Scientists" ("Science in Context", 33, 4, 2020, pp. 441-471); Oltre, la follia. La professionalizzazione della psichiatria in Terra di Bari nel primo Novecento (Edizioni Giuseppe Laterza, 2020). He is currently a junior researcher at the University of Bari Aldo Moro.

Emiliano Loria, a tenured professor of Philosophy and History in high schools, is a collaborator at the University of Eastern Piedmont and Project Manager of the Erasmus+ "Beyond the Emergency project (2021-2024)", dedicated to innovative teaching of Telemedicine. In the field of philosophy and developmental psychology, he published Learning through others (Accademia University Press 2020); with Stefano Iacone and Cristina Meini, he has published the book Complottisti vulnerabili. Le ragioni profonde del cospirazionismo (Rosenberg & Sellier 2023).

Antonio Scarafone is a philosopher specializing in philosophy of psychology and philosophy of language. He is employed as a Juan de la Cierva postdoctoral researcher at the University of the Basque Country (UPV/EHU), and he is affiliated to the Language in Neurodiversity (Lindy Lab) research group. His research focuses on philosophical questions about typical and atypical development, with emphasis on infant communication, normativity, and concepts acquisition.

Edoardo Vaccargiu is a post-doctoral researcher at the Cognitive Science Centre of the University of Neuchâtel, Switzerland. He studied philosophy of language and mind at the University of Turin and earned his PhD in philosophy at the University of Genoa (FINO Consortium). His research focuses on open foundational questions in cognitive and experimental pragmatics, such as the role of pragmatic understanding in the architecture of the human mind, and the relationship between pragmatics and social cognition (e.g., joint attention, Theory of Mind, and epistemic vigilance), with a privileged focus on children's pragmatic development.
